Ancient Inglishmen.

Ancient Inglishmen.

The earliest race of mon who peopled England, says Grant Ailen in "Knowledge," were the black fellows of the palæolutine or older stone age. They were low browed, herce pawed, crouching creatures, inferior even to the existing Australians, and were all swept away in the last glacual epoch. Long after the glaciers of the ice age had cleared off the face of the country, a second race occupied Britain, some of whose descendants almost undoubtedly exist there at the prisont day. These were the neolithic or latter stone age men, who have been identified, with great probability, as a branch of the same isolated Basque or Eustrarian race which now lives among the valleys of the Western Pyrennes and the Asturias Mountains. Our knowledge of them is manuly derived from their the Asturias Mountains Our knowledge of them is mainly derived from their tembs or barrows—great heaps of earth which they piled up above the holdes of their dead chieftains. From these have been taken their skeletons, their weapons, their domestic utensils and their consenses.

ons, their domestic utensis and their ornaments.

In stature, the neolithic men were short and thick-get, not often exceeding five teet four inches. In complexion, they were probably white, but swarthy, like the darkest Itahaus and Spaniards, or even the Moors. Their skulls were very long and nariow, and they form the best distinguising mark of the lace, as well as the best test of its survival at the present day. The neoliths were unacquainted with the use of metal, but they employed weapons and implements of stone, not rudely chipped, like those of the older stone, age, but catefully ground and pohylied. They made potterly, too, and wove cloth, they domesticated pigs and cattle, and they cultivated course cereals in the little plots which they cleared out of the torest with their stone hat hete were about at the corne leaved on the more advanced. which they cleared out of the forest with their stone hatchets or tomahawks. In general culture, they were about at the same level as the more advanced Polynosian tribes, when they first came into contact with European eighteation. The barrows which they raised over their dead chieftains were long and rather narrow, not round, like those of the later Celtre conquerors. They appear to have lived for the most part in little stockaded villages, each occupying a small clearing in the river valleys, and fulled over by a single chief; and the barrows usually cap the summit of the boundary hills which overlook the little dales. Inside them are long-chambered galleries of large, rough-hewn stones, and when these plimitive erections are laid bare by the deay or removal of the barrow, they form the so called "Druidical monuments" of old fashioned antiquaries, a few of which are Celtic, but the greater part Eustrauan. quaries, a few of which are Celtic, but the greater part Enstranan.

Plants That Eat Animals.

We have all heard of animals that eat plants, but only recently have we learned of plants that live on animals. By recently I mean within the last twenty years. That these queer plants do really years. That these queer plants do really devour very small usects is now an established fact of history.

In 1860 Mr. Darwin, a man who studied these wonderful things, and then very kindly published books about what he learned, so that other people may also study them, began to notice some curious things about these singular plants, and then turned his attention to a study of them. He spent a great many hours watching the plants and their behavior. Day after day he would continue, till finally he had the pleasure of knowing so much about the subject that he put it in a book.

Many other naturalists have been studying these curious plants, both besting these curious plants, both be-that he put it in a book.

Many other naturalists have been studying these curious plants, both before and since the publication of Mr. Darwin's book. In New Jersey, North Carolina, and other States, as well as in England, these plants are to be found. There are several varieties of them, but I have room in this article to give you an account of them in only a general manner, and very briefly at that.

The leaves of these plants form a kind of mouth, and this mouth the plants can open when they choose. The leaves are the hids, and inside the mouth is a sort of throat. The throat extends downward toward the body of the plant, and has inside a great many little bits of very short beand, which are close together and very fuzzy. In some throats are at least two hundred of these little hairy bits. At the end of each of these is a sticky substance somewhat like common muclage.

Now, when the plant opens its mouth you see the trap is already set. All he has to do is to keep his mouth open. By an accident a fly alights on the plant—or a bug, or some other small insect—and the moment it does so it sticks fast to the guinny substance the plant is all the time making, and is caught. Fly off he can not, and the more he true to move the more be fastens himself to the sticky substance. The plant is now sure of a substance.

the more he fastens immelif to the strcky substance. The plant is now sure of a meal, for the moment a fly, a bug, on other substance touches the throat the mouth of the plant begins to shut, the leaves, or lips, immediately close over the victim and strangle him to death.

Then the plant cats the insect very much as you eat a but of meat. The way you and I eat, is this We swallow the food, and the stomach digests it for us by means of what we call gastric juice. The gastric juice is a sour and butter hourd, which cuts the food we have swallowed up and makes pulp of it. Then the glands of our stomach absorb, or drink up this fluid, and it goes into the blood and gives us health and strength.

sorb, or drink up this hund, and it goes into the blood and gives us health and strength

In the same way Mr. Plant eats the fly or bug. A sort of sour and bitter juice starts from the leaves on the inside and cuts the bug into pieces, and then into a sort of jelly, and after this the glands, of which the plant is very full, suck this jelly or liquid up and carry it all over the plant, and give hite and strength and vigor to all its parts.

As soon as one insect is eaten in this way, the leaves open again and the trap is set for another. How many an enterprising plant, of average industry, will catch and devour in a day I do not exactly know. I suppose it depends upon the number of them in the air.

The plants are not over particular about their diet, and will take beef, an egg, gelatine, and many other things of that nature. At the same time, they have some choice about their food, and will not eat grass, starch, oil, or anything that is too fatty. A gnat tickles their palate, as turtle does the tongue of an epicure, and as for a dainty, tender butterfly, why it is said that you could not please the plant better than by feednot please the plant better than by feeding one to it

So delicately is the plant made, and so sonsitive are the hundreds of boards that line its throat, that a piece of human hair, one cight-thousandth part of an inch long, dropped on the plant, will cause it to close immediately. Hall's

The latest legend of the west blut s to the effect that an Englishman named Jennings, and the father of a family of juvenile boys, refused to allow his youngsters to celebrate the Fourth of July in the way dear to each youthful heart, believing that the celebration was an insult to the CLOSE OUT British who were so badly licked something over a century ago. The little Jenningses, therefore, moped around all day on the glorious Fourth. around all day on the glorious Fourth, and watched the other kids enjoy the fun that they themselves were denied. Now, dear reader, mark the rebuke that this paternal prejudice received. On the morrow one of Mr. Jennings' boys found one or two unexploded fire crackers, and he resolved to touch them off. One refused to do its whole duty by exploding according to programme, and the boy stooped down to examine the cause of the delay. At this stage of the game the tardy fire-cracker exploded and carried off the tip of the youngster's nose. Now as that daddy gazes on the partially noseless linea-ments of his hopeful, he rues the day that he ever treated the American eagle with contunely.

THE "GAME"

was called at 3 o'clock, in the presence of a crowd of about 400 people, a number whom were ladies. By previous agree-took his position as umpire, and the contest began, while a number of Pana strikers pranced around with clubs in their hands nooting and swearing at the impartial decisions of the mapire at the very begin-players scored 2 runs and the Reds were whitewashed; in the second inning Pana was whitewashed and the Rods and two runs, making the game even.—In the third and fourth imnings both clubs got goose eggs in order, but in the first half of the fifth inning, with Pana at the bat, the trouble culminated in a general row, premeditated by the Browns and their gang of roughs, headed by Davis, "the mayor," who, when James O'Neill, the captain of his men, was told by Davis to stand back and keep still. In this memorable inning two of the Browns had struck out and there was a man on first base. Scott was pitcher and Bickes catcher for the Reds. The man on first base tried to steal second base as the ball left Scott's hand. It was caught by Bickes and thrown beautifully to second by him and feet of the base. The Reds' second baseman touched and put out the runner fair-

The Moral of the New York Strike.

The strike of the freight handlers has now lasted several weeks. They number only about three thousand men. The additional compensation or wages which they demanded was a mere trifle. But the great corporations have not seen fit to accede to their demands, and the result is that the business of the city has suffered and is still suffering severely. Contracts cannot be kept. Orders have to be cancelled. Country merchants are sending their orders to other and competing points. The moral victory-for the sympathy of the entire community is with the strikers-and the physical one is with the workingmen, for the roads have not been able to supply their places. How long is this dead-lock to continue?

The great corporations announce that they can handle all the freight sent to them, but the latest reports from their depots choked with freight corporations seem to be managed by the south, and men who have any dignity in themselves will not lightly permit their dignity to be disturbed.
